

The Engineer
By: Dennis Warner Cooper

If given an answer I value the question,

A world with no problems has no direction.

I never look at what things are, but rather what they could be.

Everything could always be better, it's all in what you see.

It all begins in the mind,

where imagination and determination begin to coincide.

It pours out from the brain onto the paper,

where a thought becomes a plan waiting for a maker.

After many errors, trials, and erases,

We get one step closer to the future's embraces.

An engineer's mind is a hungry shark,

it never stops moving, and always leaves a mark.

Always improve and question what you see,

for the world wants to be better,

and it starts with you and me.
